Ponytail items were perfect for back to school

BY BARBARA MILLER BEEM

So, what do ancient Greek women, 1970s male rock stars, and folks who have not visited a hair salon during the pandemic all have in common? It's a ponytail worn high, low, or somewhere in between, pulled up tightly and carefully secured with a rubber band, or casually gathered and held in place with a clip or barrette.

But back in the late 1950s, this popular style was more than just a convenient way to manage long hair. Marking a rite of passage, young girls unbraided their pigtails, gathered their hair into one clump, and anticipated the day when they would become teenagers. Among famous ponytails of the time were the one Sandra Dee sported on the big screen in "Gidget" and the signature topknot worn by Barbie, the doll introduced in 1959 at the New York Toy Fair.

Sensing a trend and seizing an opportunity to capitalize on a new fad, one astute businessman in particular designed "Ponytail" merchandise for discount department stores and dime stores. The target market was junior high school-aged girls. Did these items sell? You bet they did. And are these ponytail-inspired relics still hunted down and collected by nostalgic mid-century collectors? Well, you probably already know the answer to that question.

Although some of the finer points of the history of "Ponytail" have been lost over time, some things are known. There's no disputing the fact that Don Levine was on the cutting edge of this trend. A longtime designer and inspiration for popular toys, Levine was the man who perfected the process of covering cardboard with vinyl, according to Californian Deb Clarke, an avid collector of "retro" artifacts.

Aware of the overnight success of Barbie (and knowing a good thing when he saw it), Levine employed his process to produce vinyl cases that would keep a doll and her wardrobe in one easy-to-carry container. The first doll cases he put on the market were branded, not "Barbie" (which was trademarked), but "Ponytail." His generic figure of a teenage girl had no other name, but it was obvious to even the most casual observer what he had in mind, as evidenced by the four pictured silhouettes of a fashionable teen that could only be Barbie.

Ruth Handler, the "mother" of the Barbie doll, took notice, and she and Levine subsequently came to an agreement, according to

Clarke. The results? Levine's next doll case to hit the market bore not only the word "Ponytail" but also the name "Barbie." Levine followed up with a case featuring the famous doll in one of her most elegant outfits, a strapless pink evening gown accessorized with a white fur stole ("Enchanted Evening"). As Mattel went on to expand the world of Barbie to include Ken (her beau) and Midge (her gal pal), Levine kept pace with larger cases produced to accommodate these dolls and their accoutrements. Further capitalizing on the popularity of Barbie and her social circle, he introduced various soft-sided lunch boxes.

But Levine did not limit himself to Barbie-related accessories; he designed a full line of personal and school-related "Ponytail" accessories geared to pre-teens, according to collector Jimmie Bucci. Bucci was first drawn to this collecting category several years ago when he spied a bedcover that

DALLAS, Texas – J.L. Pickering has devoted his career as an archivist of images of space and related objects and artifacts. He is considered one of the foremost historians of space travel and exploration, covering them for outlets such as CNN, the Discovery Channel and SiriusXM.

Now, more than 300 photographs from his personal collection are being offered in Heritage Auctions' Sept. 24 Images of Apollo: The J.L. Pickering Collection Auction.

Featuring vintage photos and film strips from legendary NASA missions including Apollo 7, Apollo 8, Apollo 10 and Apollo 11, this is a jaw-dropping collection. From lift-off to walking on the moon (and everything in between), many of these images of very rare.

"We are incredibly excited to offer such an extensive collection of these iconic images," said Brad Palmer, Consignment Director/Cataloger for Heritage's Space Exploration department. Summer sale was strong for Nye & Company

BY CAROLE DEUTSCH

BLOOMFIELD, N.J. — More than three hundred years separated the two top lots of Nye's July 21-22 Estate Treasure's auction, proving bidders were eager for the best no matter what century it came from.

One quarter of the auction came from the collection of William and Linda Weimer of Florida and Ohio and featured a Queen Anne carved maple high chest of drawers, New Hampshire, 1768. The piece was signed, "Reuben Ennis, Sr. / Richard Osgood, made this drawer, 1768." It was also marked, "Presented to Mr. and Mrs. Walter F. McKenzie, August 28, 1884, by Mrs. Alice Dudley Northwood Ridge, N.H." It stood 73 ½ inches high with six drawers over a four-drawer stand, all with the original brasses. One drawer had a fan carved front. The base, which had cabriole legs and pad feet, also had drop finial accents. The piece commanded a great deal of interest and sold for $14,760.

Modern furniture and artistic elements were also an important part of the auction. Chief among them was an art glass sculpture by Lino Tagliapietra (Italian, b. 1934). The piece, 17 inches high by 15 inches wide and 3 inches deep, was from the artist's Fenice series. It was signed, "Lino Tagliapietra 2006 and brought $13,530.

Auction owner John Nye noted that if there was ever a sale to eradicate the old notion that things don't sell as well at auction in the summer, this was the sale. "While most agree that the internet has done away with the summer slump that used to occur in the auction arena, there are still some people who hold to that thinking," said Nye. "This sale was a strong sale for any season. Genres that have been soft in the market for many years brought high prices and aggressive competition from a diverse audience from coast to coast."

A mixed media on canvas abstract work of art by Jose Balmes, (Spanish, 1927-2016) was signed, "Balmes 67," and inscribed verso, "Sintura 1967 Jose Balmes." It measured approximately 4 feet by 4 feet, was estimated at $500 to $700, and achieved an impressive $10,455.

A large selection of bronze sculptures proved to be an important part of the sale. "I feel they were a big part of the auction participation draw and may have brought in many more people," Nye said. A leader among this group was a work by Robert Tait McKenzie (Canadian, 1867-1938) that was titled, "The Javelin Cast." It stood 23 3/4 inches high, was signed by the artist, and dated 1923.

The bronze depicted a male figure balancing on one leg in a forward thrust position as though he had just cast a javelin. It more than doubled the high estimate commanding $8,960.

Rugs and tapestries were topped by a large 17th Century Baroque needlepoint tapestry from Brussels. The lively piece was created in the colors of blue, green, gold, beige, and brown and depicted a yellow river with trees, cranes, and ducks, with mountains in the far distance. The tapestry was finished in a plain 1 inch blue and yellow border and measured 8 feet wide by 7 feet 4 inches long. It surpassed the high estimate of $2,500 to realize a hefty $5,843.

Another article of special interest was a Tiffany Studios bronze and Favrite glass desk lamp that was marked on the underside. It stood 15 inches high, had an adjustable arm, and sold for $7,380.

One of the charmers of the sale was a 19th Century American splint woven handled basket, 13 inches high by 12 inches deep. It sold together with a group of velvet fruit and pin cushions and commanded a staggering $3,690, against a $300 to $500 estimate.

Decorating with pieces from your academic childhood

That class photo from second grade with your favorite elementary school teacher, your high school yearbook, all of your report cards (even the ones with somewhat embarrassing comments): Letting go of these pieces of childhood is painful, even for the most determined downsizer.

Making this particularly problematic is the fact that these items mean absolutely nothing to anyone but you. So, what to do? As it turns out, you don't need to physically erase 12-plus years of memories. With a bit of creativity, you can still give these relics of earlier times a place of honor in your home. And you might be in good company in doing so.

Using old school desks as occasional tables beside a chair or sofa is nothing new. But to be sure, today's designers have moved on from this. Just thumb through books on modern interiors (for inspiration, I recommend Max Humphrey's "Modern Americana"), and you're bound to see yesteryear's educational tools taking their place in sophisticated room settings. Think "reverse chic" when it comes to incorporating everyday items that were once a part of our everyday school life. Specifically, we're talking old school clocks, wall maps, and handwriting charts.

But wait, there's more! For the past several years, typewriters have experienced a resurgence in popularity in some circles. And even though they might no longer be used for their intended purpose, they still look stylish on a bookshelf. Don't want just another useless gewgaw? Put them to work as attractive bookends.

In an age when most folks depend on an electronic device for navigation, it's heartening to know that old hands-on items still have a purpose, even if it's only decorative (which, come to think of it, isn't all that bad). Remember those pull-down maps in geography class? My cousin (the retired public defender) pointed out to me the other day that, at a young age, we were subliminally taught "what was where" just by glancing at those maps. These days, those that have survived are a quaint and colorful way to fill wall space, never mind the fact that they may no longer be accurate. Similarly, strategically placed three-dimensional globes seem to suggest that worldly people occupy this space.

Then there's the matter of old atlases. And beginning readers. And the aforementioned yearbooks. Do they really warrant shelf space? Call me a heretic, but I'm suggesting that now might be the time to frame specific pages of atlases, readers (sorry, Dick and Jane), and yearbooks. If you're not quite ready to unbind an otherwise useless book (brutal, I know), get copies made of a few interesting pages and frame them. On the other hand, class pictures and report cards might provide conversation starters if framed and displayed. Enjoy them while you have them.

A bit more: Old school pennants never go out of style. Be true to your school and tack them up on a wall where you can see them every day. Although I no longer have my college pennant, I never discarded my old freshman "dink." Thank goodness: What better fashion accessory for my old pal Teddy?

A few parting thoughts. There are limits. No need to display the human skeletons (real or manufactured) that dangled in the front of high school bio classrooms. Dunce caps are another no-no, but as an aside, I'm willing to bet that if I were to ask my grandkids what those pointy hats were used for, they would have absolutely no idea what I was talking about. And hairnets from the cafeteria ladies (think Miss Beazley from Riverdale High) need not be memorialized.

On the other hand, even though I'm not certain that this could ever be verified, I have a feeling that ranking second behind abandoned factories are vacated schoolhouses, now being used as antique shops.

Talk about the ultimate repurposing: You can still almost smell the white paste.

Finally, I can't help but wonder what items today's students will want in their homes years from now: Tangled power cords? Broken headphones? Dried-up white board markers?

NES games helped educate more than most parents realized

My next book, "The NES Omnibus: The Nintendo Entertainment System and Its Games," Volume 2 (M-Z), will be out in November. In addition to game reviews, synopses, and the like from yours truly, it features essays on particular games and certain aspects of the industry by other writers. One such essay is so good I wanted to share it here. It was written by Shane Stein, a financial advisor and the Executive Producer of a forthcoming independent film called "The Game Chasers Movie."

In the essay, Stein recalls the education he got as a kid from playing one of the most iconic gaming consoles of all time, the Nintendo Entertainment System. He illustrates with nostalgic resonance that you can indeed get more from video games than just faster reflexes and blisters on your thumbs. Enjoy!

Everything I Needed to Know, I Learned from the NES

By Shane Stein

Everything I needed to know, I learned from the NES. An exaggeration? Well, yes, of course. But surprisingly enough, and perhaps to the chagrin of 1980s parents everywhere, Nintendo games genuinely did teach us far more about the broader world than we probably ever realized. We just simply needed to pay attention.

Today, we take for granted that the world's information is readily available at our fingertips. Prior to the internet, however, the average American kid had dramatically less access and exposure to most of the globe's peoples, history, news, entertainment, and far more. Sure, we learned a decent amount in school, through parents and friends, and from books, movies, and magazines. But widespread accessible information on any given topic was virtually nil compared to the present. Need, for example, to research Japanese history for that term paper? These days, of course, we Google it. Back then—head to the library and spend hours finding that one book you need amongst a stack of thousands. Hope you know your Dewey Decimal system and hush your voice around the librarian.

Fascinatingly, though, significant knowledge of the world outside our immediate childhood surroundings could be gleaned from, of all sources, the Nintendo Entertainment System and its games. How can this be, you might ask? Obviously, it wasn't remotely comparable to today's internet. But the vast NES oeuvre, encompassing a substantial array of game genres and categories, truly provided a slice of worldly education.

Want to learn about a new sport, for instance? Growing up in Texas, I played endless amounts of baseball, basketball, football, and soccer. But never ice hockey—indeed, I never even learned to properly skate, much less chase a puck. Hockey was little more than an abstract notion to most of us raised south of the Mason-Dixon line. And yet, thanks to Ice Hockey on the NES, I learned the game's rules so well I could even describe "icing" from the referee's perspective. (I also learned that video hockey players came in three categories – big/slow, medium, and fast/skinny—but that's a whole other story!)

How about golf and skateboarding, two other pastimes I rarely experienced in person? Golf on the NES taught me not only that Mario favors the links, but also the fundamentals of club selection and calculating windspeed's effect on the ball. Skate or Die, meanwhile, imparted an entire skating culture's milieu and lingo, from freestyle to downhill jams to ollies and rail slides. Eventually I did pick up golf as a teenager, and the NES experience most certainly assisted with my development. I never ultimately pursued skateboarding, but at least I was no longer clueless when it came up in conversation.

Okay, so those are just fun and games. How about more serious topics, like politics and history? For contemporary lessons on the Cold War, try Rush'n Attack and Golgo 13: Top Secret Episode. The thinly veiled title of the former was a genuine concern until the 1989 Berlin Wall collapse, and the player starred as a singular U.S. soldier, armed initially with only a knife, and yet aiming to infiltrate and bring down the Soviet superpower. (Echoes of Schwarzenegger and Stallone movies, anyone?) The latter game, meanwhile, whisked players all around the world in an espionage battle between the CIA, KGB, and other intelligence agencies. Exotic locales included Berlin, Athens, Rio de Janeiro, and even Antarctica. How many American kids learned in school about Berlin's Tegel Airport, Potsdam Station, and Spree River, or about Athens' Parthenon, Theater of Dionysius, and Herodes Concert Hall? Those of us who played Golgo 13 were in the know.

What about East Asian culture, you might ask, of which Americans regularly encounter today but back then hardly experienced? Years before ever hearing of sushi or watching Ichiro play baseball, I ascertained plenty from the games Kid Niki, Flying Dragon: The Secret Scroll, and The Legend of Kage. Broader America first learned of Jackie Chan upon his first U.S.-marketed film, 1996's Rumble in the Bronx. But NES gamers had known his exploits for years thanks to Jackie Chan's Action Kung Fu. Obviously, these brushes with East Asia were mere bucket drops compared to actually living there, but for many kids here in the States, the NES is truly the closest we got.

And how about reading comprehension, something the NES certainly was accused of pushing kids away from? Besides Nintendo Power, which millions of us consumed, try some of the games' instruction booklets. The stories behind Dragon Warrior, Faxanadu, and Final Fantasy come across as thrilling as any young adult fantasy novel. Indeed, Nintendo even seemed to recognize this, licensing their name to the "Worlds of Power" novelization series for Metal Gear, Castlevania II: Simon's Quest, Ninja Gaiden, and others.

Interested in robotics? Mega Man and its sequels may have been light years ahead of reality, but the titular robot hero and his exploits surely inspired plenty of budding scientists. And how many kids, fascinated by the stealth military strategy of Metal Gear, Jackal, Commando, and others, perhaps received their initial inspiration to join the U.S. Armed Forces and defend America? (If you think this is a reach, look no further than Star Trek, which inspired countless young people to pursue careers in science, engineering, and astronautics.)

Even games without ostensibly thematic connections to certain topics could still impart their wisdom. The Legend of Zelda is by no means about animals per se, but I first heard of sea urchins thanks to its enemy character Digdogger. Nor did I realize a boxing match could end without a knockdown, until encountering the Win by TKO in Mike Tyson's Punch-Out!! And who could have imagined learning about celebrities—Iggy Pop, Morton Downey Jr., Lemmy from Motorhead, and Beethoven amongst them—through Super Mario Bros. 3's Koopaling characters? (Seeing SMB 3's Beethoven knock-off was almost as cool as watching him rock out in the movie Bill & Ted's Excellent Adventure!)

Above: Shane Stein is a good friend, a loyal reader of my work, and a big fan of Nintendo.

Below: Stein's love for the NES sparked his interest in fantasy novels, including the "Worlds of Power" series.

And the list goes on. We're really just scratching the surface of what the NES exposed us to, and it's almost impossible not to learn something new simply by firing up the controller. With such an expansive variety of games, both American-made and globally produced, in-house as well as third-party, from individual and team sports, to action and adventure, to puzzles and strategy, science and military, fantasy and RPG, arcade and crime fighting, light gun and power pad, and so much more, Nintendo truly had it covered.

Today, we of course live in a far more advanced digital world. The phones in our hands literally carry more processing power than the supercomputers of the 1980s. We are effectively one click (or voice command) away from most any information, and we are far advantaged for it. But a modicum of interesting and practical knowledge nonetheless remains available through the NES, if only we choose to explore it. In the spirit of education along with entertainment, here's to retro NES gaming far into the future!

Below: While Stein got his NES education through sports and action/adventure titles, the iconic console did have some actual "edutainment" games, such as Donkey Kong Jr. Math.

Ponytails

featured a '50s teen motif. One thing led to another, and he soon found himself collecting all things "Ponytail."

The Massachusetts resident's collection includes an array of "Ponytail" and related items. Bucci said that young girls of the time must have dreamt of living the lifestyle of a teenager: lying on their backs with their feet in the air, wearing pedal pushers, and listening to records, writing letters, and talking on the telephone. Think Ann Margaret in "Bye Bye Birdie," Bucci suggested.

To be certain, many collectors still seek "Ponytail" soft lunch boxes that survived milk leaks. But other items not exposed to lunchtime spills abound, according to Bucci. They include record cases ("Tune Totes" or "Rhythm Totes") for 45 rpms (including even one that pictures Pat Boone), scrapbooks, and autograph books. One popular carry-on travel case, the "aviator bag," came in a variety of colors and featured a picture-within-a-picture of Ponytail waving goodbye while carrying her own miniature Ponytail aviator bag. Banks ("Stash for Cash") and eyeglass cases are collectable, as are soft-sided photo albums and picture frames ("This is 'Him'" included stock photos of Rock Hudson, Frankie Avalon, and others).

For the more academically minded pre-teens, there were pencil cases and pencil holders, desk blotters and dictionaries ("Miss Know It All" by Ponytail). Fold-up locker vanities, marking graduation from elementary school to junior high, were perfect for that between-class touch-up, thanks to a comb and mirror. "My Treasures" boxes (with a key) and diaries (also with a key) suggest that keeping private property private was of the utmost importance, according to Bucci.

Collectors continue to look for different products with names other than "Ponytail," including "Deb-U-Teen" and "date line," as well as "Siris." Levine is known to have worked with several manufacturing companies, and these variations seem to be in keeping with licensing agreements made at the time. Not surprisingly, there were also "knock-offs." Examples of these items in Bucci's collection (in addition to the aforementioned bedcover) are aprons and flannel yard goods, paper party accessories, and day-of-the-week hankies, as well as figurines.

Later generations would have "Hello Kitty" and Lisa Frank merchandise. But what happened that "Ponytail" faded from view? According to Clarke, the answer probably lies in the fate of the hairdo that started it all. Thanks to new trendsetters, including First Lady Jacqueline Kennedy, as well as hairspray, new bouffant hairdos became popular. In 1962, even Barbie traded in her strapless striped maillot and ponytail for a sleek red bathing suit and a "bubble cut."

And as for Don Levine, he went on to develop more toys. Remember G.I. Joe?

Right: Ponytail picture in a ponytail picture: "Aviator bags" featured Ponytail about to board an airplane as she clutched her own "aviator bag."

Above: "My Treasures" on the left is signed "Ponytail" and pictures a gal with a ponytail. On the right is a similar accessory, but the teen has a bubble cut, and the box is marked "date line," perhaps indicating it was made later than the first. Much of the "back story" of Ponytail will probably never be fully known.

Above: No girl could be without her 45s. One thing that these examples all have in common is that they were made of vinyl-covered cardboard, a process developed by Don Levine.

Below: Entering junior high school was a rite of passage, a world of changing classes, Phys ed uniforms, and lockers.

Below: Sometimes identified as "date line," others as "Ponytail," items such as scrapbooks and photo albums appealed to modern mid-century misses.

Right: From autograph books to dictionaries, ho-hum items were more fun when they pictured a ponytailed teen.

Above: Those who collect ponytail-themed items need not limit themselves to the originals, as designed by Don Levine. "Knock-offs" are interesting as well.
