Cruise down memory lane with car dealer catalogs

BY WILLIAM FLOOD

Imagine discovering a 1964 Mustang in flawless, untouched condition - every factory option intact, the original paint gleaming like the day it left the line. You may never have one of those parked in your garage (unless you're ready to mortgage your house for the privilege), but the dealer catalog from that year offers the next best thing: a printed time capsule showcasing the car when it was new.

Once just sales materials, dealer catalogs are now popular collectibles that both portray cars of interest and also the eras in which they existed. They offer a striking contrast to today's uninspiring sales tools. Buying a car now often involves scrolling through a manufacturer's website or scanning a QR code for details on your phone. In earlier decades, however, you'd leave the showroom with a full-color catalog — so thoughtfully designed and visually rich that it might have ended up on your coffee table.

Dealership catalogs have been around since the late 19th century, emerging when automobiles transitioned from expensive novelties for the wealthy to practical forms of transportation. Manufacturers adopted guidebooks as a way of introducing their vehicles to the public. These early catalogs were mainly technical manuals, sometimes enhanced with a few hand-drawn illustrations or lithographed photographs, intended to provide detailed information rather than sales pitches.

During the 1930s and 1940s, dealer catalogs began shifting away from purely technical manuals, adapting to changing consumer tastes and the effects of the Great Depression and World War II. While still centered on specifications, they began to feature more imagery and storytelling to create an emotional connection with buyers. The art of selling cars gradually evolved, as manufacturers blended practicality with aspiration, paving the way for more visually compelling promotions in the decades to follow.

The 1950s and 1960s were the golden age of automotive design, mirrored in the increasing sophistication of dealer literature of the time. Manufacturers employed renowned artists and photographers to produce visually striking catalogs that highlighted the sleek lines and innovative features of their vehicles. These catalogs often included thick, sometimes embossed cardstock covers, fold-out pages, detailed illustrations, and high-quality photographs, offering prospective buyers an immersive experience. The content was meticulously curated to evoke emotions, with taglines and narratives that connected the car to aspirations of success, modernity, and style.

By the 1970s, dealer catalogs had become even more impressive, often featuring foil lettering on their covers and textured inserts. Some went as far as including fabric swatches, upholstery samples, and paint chips - helping buyers visualize the finished car. Many catalogs also showcased detailed engine and body cutaways, highlighting the car's engineering and appealing to the mechanically inclined. It was print marketing at its finest!

Dealer catalogs held steady through the 1980s and 1990s, but with the rise of digital marketing in the 2000s their use began to slowly fade. Initially, digital

Dick and Jane taught generations of kids to read

BY CISSY HALLISEY

“See Spot Run!” That simple three-word phrase evokes nostalgic memories for several generations of readers. If you are one of the people who grew up in the 1930s through the 1970s, chances are you encountered Dick, Jane, Sally, Spot and Puff during your early reading years.

Dick was the older brother to sister Jane and baby sister Sally (originally just called “Baby”.) The three were middle-class children, with typical lives and adventures that were shared with young readers through the Dick and Jane series of books. They lived with Mother and Father, had a cocker spaniel named “Spot” (although, in the earliest versions, Spot was a cat, then a terrier, before finally being depicted as a cocker spaniel) and a cat named Puff (originally named “Little Mew.”) There was a teddy bear named Tim, and, over time, various friends entered the stories along with Grandmother and Grandfather.

Prior to the Dick and Jane books most reading primers contained stories from the Bible or fairy tales. Pictures were few and story lines were more complicated. The simplified Dick and Jane books became so popular that in the 1950s approximately 80 percent of first graders were learning to read from them.

Dick and Jane were created in 1930 by a former schoolteacher named Zerna Sharp. The characters made their first appearance in the Elson-Gray Readers before having their own series. Concerned with the struggle of schoolchildren learning to read, Sharp worked with William Scott Gray to develop reading primers using the “sight word” method of teaching reading. In this teaching method children learned to recognize whole words by sight, rather than using the phonics method of sounding out words. They assumed that repetitive use of a word would lead to word recognition. Sharp created the characters and story lines for the books while Gray, along with other writers, wrote the actual text. They assumed that repetitive use

Heart of Ohio Postcard Show celebrates golden jubilee

BY WILLIAM FLOOD

HILLIARD, Ohio —The Heart of Ohio Postcard Club celebrated a milestone in June as it hosted its 50th anniversary during this year’s Heart of Ohio Postcard Show. Held at the Franklin County Fairgrounds on the western edge of Columbus, the event brought together collectors, dealers, and ephemera enthusiasts from across the Midwest.

The club and event can be traced back to 1975. As its namesake suggests, the club promotes the hobby of postcard collecting, also known as deltiology. It is one of the longest-running groups of its type in the region. While deltiology remains at the heart of the club’s mission, its reach extends to all forms of printed and visual memorabilia. This year’s show, while primarily postcard-focused, also featured a wide range of ephemera: vintage advertisements, early photographs, stereoviews, movie posters, and more.

Sandy Andromeda, a local historian and the club’s founder, reflecting on the club’s five decades, commented, “I started it because I wanted to collect history.” He added, “We’re celebrating 50 years, but there have been more than 50 shows. In those 50 years, we’ve sometimes had three shows a year.”

Most of the show’s early years were at the former Aladdin Temple. However, a few years before the pandemic, the event was moved to its current home at the Franklin County Fairgrounds. After a COVID-induced pause, the club resumed meetings in 2023, and the show returned in 2024.

Helping to organize this year’s show was Terry Bigler, who promotes ephemera shows across Ohio, including the bi-annual Columbus Paper, Postcard, and Book Show. Biglar noted that this show is different because it’s hosted by the club, whereas his sibling shows are more commercially driven.

This event is also fairly modest in scope as contrasted to larger paper shows. Around 20 vendors participated this time. As would be expected, many arrived from Ohio. But, they also came from nearby states, including Pennsylvania and Michigan, and even as far away as Illinois and Tennessee. While postcard boxes dominated most of the tables, their offerings spanned other forms of ephemera, including advertising, historic correspondence, antique books, and autographed memorabilia.

Although small in scale, the event was well attended - and buyers were enthusiastic. Projections suggested over 100 guests were in attendance. Collectors at all levels, and with varying interests, had plenty to browse. Postcard bargain hunters found boxes priced at $1 per al stories. These stories were written in a manner to develop the reader's sight-reading skills. Each page of a story introduced one new word, but only five new words were introduced per story. Subsequent stories within a book built on adding more sight words. With each grade level more and more words were introduced, starting at Grade 1 and going through Grade 9.

An endearing quality of these vintage books is the proliferation of charming illustrations. Original illustrators were Eleanor Campbell and Keith Ward. In the 1950s Robert Childress took over along with Corinne Boyd Dillon, followed by Richard Wiley and Jack White in the 1960s. The artists used watercolors to create scenes to reinforce the meanings of the sight words. Every page had an illustration.

The stories were intentionally written and illustrated to take place in a generic geographic location so that they would be relatable to students nationwide. They lacked references to regional features such as oceans or mountains.

Not only did these books teach reading skills, they also taught values of the time. The children were well-behaved, did their chores, helped others and were respectful. There was some criticism, though. As times changed many people felt that the white, middle-class family where Father had a job and Mother stayed home with the kids was not representative of the changing culture. Many voiced concerns that the stories were not relatable to many students. They felt the books lacked diversity as far as gender roles, race and the changing public concept of a typical family.

Dick and Jane books continued to be printed through 1965. During that year a new Grade 1 book was created featuring an African American family consisting of Father, Mother, a son named Mike and twin daughters, Pam and Penny. This family was also middle-class with similar daily activities and adventures as the white family in the Dick and Jane books.

1965 was the final year for printing the series. Critics of the "sight word" method of teaching reading convinced publishers and educators that phonics-based learning led to better reading skills for students. One notable critic was Theodore Geisel, the author of the Dr. Seuss books. He considered the stories in the Dick and Jane books to be dull. Major book publishers challenged him to write a children's primer using only 220 vocabulary words. He accepted the challenge and wrote The Cat in the Hat as an alternative primer. It utilized phonics-based teaching and was a big success. This led to the creation of the Beginner Books series. Nevertheless, many schools continued to utilize the Dick and Jane books though the 1970s.

Over the years many of these books were discarded or destroyed. Fortunately, many survived though, and are sought after by collectors for their grade school memories. There have also been reprints from time to time to make it easier for those who grew up with Dick and Jane to relive a bit of their childhood.

card. Meanwhile, most buyers flipped through boxes carefully organized along geographic or topical lines, priced between $3 and $6. Rarer cards, including the highly sought real photo postcards (RPPCs), were usually displayed in binders, with prices often reaching into the double digits.

Photography fans explored daguerreotypes, tintypes, military portraits, and stereoviews, priced from $2 to around $60. Nearby, sports and entertainment buffs eyed autographed photos, playbooks, vintage sheet music, and sports cards. Price tags for those started around $5 but ran into the hundreds of dollars for exceptional pieces. There was even a handful of movie and other event posters that started around $50. In a different vein, one vendor offered collecting supplies, such as postcard sleeves and storage boxes, essentials for the hobby.

Though compact, the show reflected the enthusiasm of the community of postcard and ephemera collectors who have kept the Heart of Ohio Postcard Club thriving for five decades. It wasn't about crowds or hype, but about a shared hobby that, for many, began with a single postcard purchase and evolved into a lifelong pastime.

If you are interested in next year's gathering, the Heart of Ohio Postcard Show is held each year, around the first full weekend in June at the Edwards Building at the Franklin County Fairgrounds, 5035 Northwest Parkway, Hilliard, Ohio. Admission is $5, and parking information came in the form of CDs accompanying printed brochures. Before long, those discs replaced paper entirely. Eventually, websites and apps became the go-to, saving the cost of paper and printing for what was considered a throwaway item.

Car catalogs

Long before digital marketing took over, car enthusiasts were already collecting vintage dealer brochures. To collectors and car enthusiasts, these aren't dusty old sales materials - they're snapshots of automotive history. They reflect a time when cars were marketed not just by price or specs, but on emotion, image, and the lifestyle they promised.

Fans of consumer marketing - particularly of car culture - know that vintage brochures offer more than just vehicle details; they reflect designers' efforts to make a car a symbol of personal identity. Take a 1965 Pontiac GTO or a '69 Corvette Stingray brochure: those didn't simply present a car; they sold swagger. Especially in later years, catalogs persuaded buyers with rich photography, showing cars cruising scenic highways, under city lights, or in front of elegant buildings - to bring the ownership experience to life. Every font, color, and image worked together to communicate a larger fantasy, with each car symbolizing a slice of its times. The 1950s tail fins and practical wagons reflected post-war optimism and a booming middle class; the gas-guzzlers of the '70s embodied material confidence; and the compact Japanese imports of the '80s marked a shift toward practicality and efficiency.

Above: Even catalogs for cars that were once scoffed at have their collectors today.

Collectors often find these marketing materials deeply personal. Many are drawn by nostalgia, buying catalogs tied to cars they currently own or once had. Thumbing through a vintage brochure can evoke vivid memories - like a former '72 Dodge Charger owner recalling the feel of hot vinyl seats on a summer day or the joy of sliding a cassette into the dashboard player. For current owners, finding the original showroom catalog adds a meaningful layer to their ownership experience.

This literature also speaks to those who long for a car that got away or one they'll never have. Maybe that 1969 Stingray is out of reach, but a vintage dealership catalog brings part of the experience to life. Fans can flip through its glossy pages, swoon over the stylized photos, and imagine themselves in the driver's seat. Even without the keys, they still get to hold a piece of the fanta-

Restorers find a different kind of value in these catalogs. For them, a dealer brochure is more than a collectible - it's a vital resource. It provides hard-to-find information on original specs, trim options, and factory features. This becomes especially important when restoring defunct brands like AMC, DeSoto, or Studebaker, whose documentation is scarce. Plus, the brochure is one of the last official voices of the brand, conveying how the car was positioned and marketed.

Beyond nostalgia and restoration, many collectors concentrate on specific niches - whether it's Jeep enthusiasts, fans of British vehicles, or admirers of 1960s muscle cars. Meanwhile, others take a more expansive approach, gathering catalogs from a wide range of manufacturers and historical periods to assemble a diverse collection.

Regardless of the draw, vintage dealer catalogs are generally easy to find. Car shows and flea markets focused on car culture are prime sources, as are specialty paper shows. Antique malls often have vendors displaying dozens of brochures in bins or filing cabinets.

Since dealership catalogs are usually collected for personal passion rather than investment, prices tend to be reasonable. Many catalogs can be found for around $5, with typical prices ranging from $10 to $25. Only the oldest or most sought-after catalogs - especially those from defunct manufacturers or iconic models - command significantly higher prices, sometimes reaching into the low hundreds.

Condition plays a reasonable role, particularly for higher-value catalogs. While a $5 Ford brochure may still be desirable even with some wear, a rare $200 Auburn edition is expected to be clean and well-preserved, with minimal fading, tears, or stains.

Collecting catalogs is a low-maintenance way to indulge a car obsession without getting grease under your nails. They don't take up much space, and there's no need for insurance or upkeep. Plus, you can enjoy flipping through them by the fire with a good drink, even when the weather is uncooperative. That said, it's just as important to protect this old paperwork as to keep an old car under roof. Using acid-free sleeves and storing them in a cool, dry place is the best way to preserve them - so, your garage may not be ideal. While these look great framed, keep in mind that framing limits access to the interior pages.

Whether enjoyed quietly at the kitchen table or displayed proudly alongside a restoration project, a dealer catalog captures a vehicle's legacy. It reveals how automakers shaped the buyer's experience and lifestyle through the pages of a simple printed brochure.
