Collectors get their money's worth with trade tokens

BY WILLIAM FLOOD

You may have seen them at an antique show: little objects that look like coins, but upon closer inspection, clearly aren't. Instead of the name of a government, they might bear the name of a company or store, along with words or symbols that hint at what they were used for. What you may have come across are trade tokens, and for collectors, they offer inexpensive access to owning a small piece of commercial history.

Trade tokens were privately issued pieces that were used in place of money or as a form of credit. Businesses issued them to be redeemed for merchandise, drinks, services, and, in some cases, as part of a company's system of paying their workers. Today, they are part of a collecting field known as exonumia, which includes tokens, medals, and other coin-like pieces that aren't regular government-issued coins.

Their use goes back centuries, but trade tokens became especially common during industrialization in the 19th and early 20th centuries, when growing businesses, factories, and mines needed convenient ways to handle small transactions and credit that didn't involve currency.

The basic idea was simple: a merchant issued a token promising a certain value when it was brought back to the business. Tokens were not official money, generally could not be used outside the issuing firm, and did no contain any precious metal. Their value came solely from the issuing business.

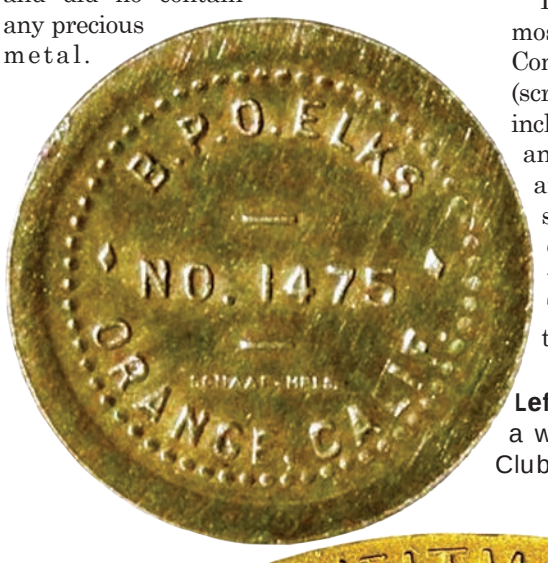

Above: While trade tokens are generally affordable. Very rare and historically significant examples can command prices into the thousands, like this WIGWAM SALOON, EL PASO, Texas example that sold for over $2,000.

Above: This token from the Phillips crab packing company was available for just $5.99

Factories and mines were among the most common users of trade tokens. Company-store tokens, often called scrip (scrip is actually a broader term that includes various forms of substitute money and credit), allowed workers to obtain food and other necessities at company-owned stores. Company scrip was especially common in remote mining and factory towns, where cash could be scarce. These pieces interest collectors because they document the realities of company-town life and preserve the names of businesses and communities that have since changed or disappeared.

Trade tokens were not solely issued by factories or mines. A general store might issue tokens as a form of credit, encouraging customers to return to the store to spend them. A restaurant or saloon might have provided tokens redeemable for particular items. A hotel or even Right: Just like real coins, trade tokens had different information on the face and reverse. That often included the identification of the company and denomination.

Left: Trade tokens were not always round. This oval-shaped one ($8) is a bit uncommon.

Collectors love going "into the woods" to find treasures

By Susan Emerson Nutter

COLUMBIANA, Ohio - When the morning air becomes brisk. When the goldenrod swaths farm fields in yellow; when trucks and vans pull up to the acres of trees outside of Columbiana, Ohio... it's time for Antiques in the Woods & Vintage Too. This year's event took place Sept. 12-13.

For more than 40 years, shoppers have been attending this show to look for vintage and antique items; a place where "a walk in the woods" takes on a whole new meaning. Under the management of antique dealers Michelle and Rege Monstrola; who took on this responsibility three years ago, Antiques in the Woods & Vintage Too surpassed expectations despite a rainstorm; or two.

"The show continues to grow which is wonderful," Michelle said. "This year we filled 110 booths; up from 91 booths in 2025." Understand the term "booth" has a different meaning at Antiques in the Woods. Each dealer space is actually a structure – a tiny house of sorts, with some having an added porch or lean-to. Some structures include two or three rooms. No two are alike. All are placed along gravel paths and tucked into acres and acres of woods; so at this show, one truly needs a map to see everything, and meandering is encouraged. "You never know what you will find

Chinese export porcelain comes to life in Philadelphia

By Barbara Miller Beem

PHILADELPHIA – The patriotic red, white, and blue decorations are gone. The parades, concerts, and fireworks that marked the 250th anniversary of America's Declaration of Independence are now just a memory. But in Philadelphia, the city where it all began, the Independence Seaport Museum continues to commemorate America's Semiquincentennial anniversary by interpreting the story of the fledgling country's economic and political history. And as it happens, even after the Fourth of July, the museum's exhibition continues to grow in size.

From now until January 3, 2028, some 150 artifacts are on display as part of the museum's landmark exhibition, "Seeking Profit and Power: Philadelphia, China Trade, and the Making of America." Thanks to five recent acquisitions of Chinese porcelain, the reason to visit the City of Brotherly Love is as compelling as ever. Quite simply, those who have al-around the next turn," Michelle said with a smile.

Primitives and early advertising intermingle with mid-century modern pieces, jewelry, garden décor and stoneware. The variety of items from differing eras is the main lure of this event, along with the setting, the wonderful food vendors, and live music.

"We want the show to be a destination," Michelle explains. "One where shoppers do come back the second day because there was so much to see and they want a second look." Michelle and Rege encourage that return visit via selfie taking. "We have a backdrop inside the show, that if you take a selfie in front of it once you've paid the Saturday admission fee, you get in free on Sunday when you show that selfie to our ticket takers."

Besides an uptick in dealer participation this year, management also offered porting services for easy removal of larger items. "Everyone really appreciated that free service so it will be back next year," Michelle said.

Shopping this show is an adventure as prices for items are as inexpensive as 50 cents but can also reach $10,000 mark. Dennis Leach of Central City, CO, had that $10,000 item – a Power-lube Motor Oil porcelain sign complete with the company's prowling tiger logo. He also had a Power-lube Motor Oil can priced $3,000. Leach said this company first pumped oil after World War I but eventually faded out in the 1930s.

Mark Hamilton of Ellwood City, Pa., brought along an item fitting not only for the woods but for the upcoming holiday season. On display in Hamilton's booth was a wonderful painted brass figural of a wild turkey priced $200. It had a "National Wild Turkey Federation" seal on its wooden base as well as a metal plaque stating "The Survivor" by artist Greg O'Neal and that it was number 1316 of an edition of 2,600.

Above: Priced $200 by Mark Hamilton of Ellwood City, Pa., this National Wild Turkey Federation figural painted brass turkey "The Survivor" by artist Greg O'Neal was number 1316 of an edition of 2,600.

Reasonably priced items filled the dealer space of Vintystash of Lisbon, Ohio. Two pieces of green Fenton custard or satin uranium glass that glowed under blacklight were available. The art glass ruffled rim vase with hand-painted daisies was $50 as was a ruffled compote. A Northwood Carnival glass "tree trunk" vase also wore a $50 price tag.

Anthony Worrellia of Youngstown, Ohio, is known for his love of all things holiday, especially Halloween. He had a variety of early papier-mache pumpkins priced from $150 to $350. The booth of Bert Rossi of Mercer, Pa., featured a wall of canine art with Scotties, terriers, and setters being most prevalent. Some were prints, some were oil on board – all were charming and priced from $8 to $40.

Above: Vintystash of Lisbon, Ohio, had the two Fenton uranium custard glass pieces – a compote and a painted vase each priced at $50. The Carnival glass vase was also tagged $50.

It seemed like collections of items were in many dealer spaces. Herb and Cherly Renner of Berlin, Ohio, had a plethora of wooden sleds with metal runners most priced around the $25 to $30 mark. Jeff Wasylychyn of Youngstown, Ohio, boasted an entire herd of brass deer. The larger standing examples were $200 as was the larger deer that was lying down. The smaller deer were more in the $50 price range.

Michael Johnson of Painesville, Ohio, filled four small structures with items even spilling out into the areas around each tiny home. A taxidermy of a mountain lion sold early Saturday, but still available a full-size metal painted baptismal font priced $1,895 and a 232-drawer wooden cabinet from a defunct auto parts store which was tagged $3,595.

"We were so pleased with what was in the woods this year," Michelle said. "And we are so thankful for everyone involved. We could not do this show without them. We were disappointed with the rain, but appreciate shoppers for dodging raindrops at times, and were happy to see so many buyers leaving the woods with packages."

Mark your calendar now. Next year's Antiques in the Woods &Vintage Too will take place Sept. 11-12.

Above: Dogs on display made up one wall of the dealer space of Bert Rossi of Mercer, Pa. The colorful oil on board of the two setters was $30, while the black and white print of terriers "Sandy and Jock" signed by the artist was $30.

Above: More than 30 wooden sleds with metal runners could be found in the dealer space of Herb and Cheryl Renner of Berlin, Ohio.

Below: It seems only fitting this herd of brass deer would be displayed with Santa! The Coca-Cola Santa was priced $200. Deer were tagged from $50 to $200. All were in the dealer space of Jeff Wasylychyn of Youngstown, Ohio.

Below: Also in the dealer space of Michael Johnson of Painesville, Ohio, was this mid-century modern stunner; a giraffe lamp by Uno and Osten Kristiansson which was priced $2,875.

Chinese Export Porcelain

ready visited this exhibition should probably plan a return trip.

The museum, located along the Delaware River, chose not to focus on battles or legislative victories for its Sesquicentennial offering. Instead, the museum decided to educate the public by examining the history of trade in early America. And as it happens, America's first trading partner, critical to the economic survival of the newly-declared independent country was China.

Having chosen to follow this story line, Peter Seibert, looking back, noted the museum's decision to "tackle the question" of how the new country could "become viable in its new reality." As president and CEO of the museum, Seibert explained that early Americans were reluctant to cede the luxurious items that they had enjoyed as British subjects. Think silk fabrics, lacquerware, and tea, as well as porcelain wares. In exchange, America had what the Chinese wanted, which included silver and animal pelts.

With independence, though, the playing field had changed. America could no longer count on the protection of the British crown when threatened by challenges that included pirates. Adjustments were made, and trade between the two entities flourished, as evidenced by the many examples of wares that have survived.

Among the five objects most recently acquired (and now on exhibit at the Independence Seaport Museum) are a cup and saucer, both of which bear a central cartouche of a shield with the letter "M." These two porcelain pieces were originally part of a service ordered by Thomas Mifflin and his wife, Sarah née Morris. A Philadelphia merchant recognized as one of the nation's founding fathers, Morris was a signer of the United States Constitution and the first governor of Pennsylvania. These pieces originally arrived in Philadelphia aboard the ship "Canton." They are currently on display alongside the letter signed by Mifflin that introduced Captain John Green of the newly formed United States to the Chinese.

Above: A cup and saucer, part of a service ordered by Thomas Mifflin and his wife Sarah. Mifflin is remembered as a founding father of the country, a signer of the United States Constitution, and the first governor of Pennsylvania.

An "interesting small platter," a porcelain piece bearing a central medallion that features an urn, now joins other pieces of Commodore Richard Dale's service that are already in the museum's collection. Seibert called this example a "key piece," of particular interest due to its size and form.

While thinking of those beverages enjoyed in China, tea is likely to spring to mind. But two other recent museum acquisitions might figuratively break that mold. The first is a porcelain cider jug, intended for the consumption of hard cider. This decorative piece, likely part of a service made for the Lewis family of Philadelphia, can now be viewed in conjunction with drawings made of the interior of the Lewis family home. Among the objects pictured in these illustrations are examples of China trade pieces.

The other is a porcelain coffee mug which Seibert said the museum "had to have." Commissioned by Israel Wistar Morris, this mug was decorated with a design believed to have been drawn by Morris' wife Mary, both of whom were Quakers. Pictured are an outdoor scene of a farmer with a cow. This motif has come to be known as the "Quaker cow pattern."

Finally, there is a handled cup and saucer with a rose vine border and stylized central design. It is believed to have belonged to Benjamin Ettig, a Chinese trade merchant based in Philadelphia. An exporter of such goods as furs, metals, grains, and ginseng from Appalachia, Ettig imported porcelains, tea, spices, textiles, and furniture.

Seibert noted that this exhibition has been well received. "In this crowded field, the museum has found its niche," he said, blending what he called "the local story" with the commercial maritime theme. "The Chinese trade story makes a lot of sense," he concluded, "There is some degree of modern relevance."

1931 mail truck delivered $34,000 bid at Super Auction

By Karin Milliman

TIPTON, Mich. — The Super Auction, held several times a year, offers a unique way to buy and sell at auction. You can find photos of what's being sold online, but you really need to attend in person to experience the full event. If you have never been to The Super Auction, add it to your list and make the trip for a truly unique day of auction buying.

Several sellers come in and set up their own area; some sell their own items, while others have an auctioneer sell them. Either way, every item is carefully displayed, and the sellers are available to answer any questions you may have. There are comfortable chairs set up so you can find a seat in front of whatever you are interested in, whether it be toys, military, collectible cards, car parts and cars, jewelry – every category has its own space. And then when it's time to start, all sections begin selling at once, so pay attention to the auctioneer you are following and don't get distracted by the auctioneer selling beside or behind you. They only have one hour to sell their wares, and then another group of sellers takes up the auction chant. They change items being sold every single hour, so if you can't find anything that interests you in the first group, hang around for the second hour or the third hour or the fourth hour – well, you get it.

Attending an auction is so different than following it on the internet. You get personal stories you don't get from watching a computer screen at home while the items go off one at a time. The interaction is so much better, and it brings every auction to life. You get some stories, some laughs, make new friends, and see old acquaintances. And this Super Auction is a great one to attend if you want to experience the pluses of attending an auction.

The Super Auction always has interesting automobiles, and this one was no exception. Many potential bidders studied them, waiting for a chance to be the high bidder and take one home. The one that brought the most money was a 1931 Ford mail truck. This historic vehicle was one of about 500 built that year. It was well-maintained and loved. It had some repainting of metal components, and the wooden areas were repaired as needed. It ran, drove, and showed no rust. It included an original mailman uniform, leather mailbag, hat, and badge. After bidding rose quickly on this amazingly well-maintained piece of history, the hammer finally fell at $34,000.

A 1929 Ford Model A Roadster had been restored and came with extensive documentation tracing its history. It was purchased in Tallahassee, Fla., on Feb. 9, 2000, and taken to North Carolina, where it lived for about eight years. It was then taken to Manchester, Mich. Hart's Machine Shop in Cecil, Ohio, rebuilt the engine and transmission in 2007. The speedometer was also rebuilt at this time, and the mileage was then set to zero miles to reflect the miles since the engine overhaul. Parts of this vehicle gleamed in the sun, and they were all nickel except the bumpers. It had new tires and tubes and was repainted by a painter in Clinton, Mic. It had side curtains and a vehicle cover and would run and drive. It had a clear green title and showed 635 miles since the last engine rebuild. It took a very respectful bid of $17,000 to drive this beauty home.

A 1930 Ford Model A pickup truck had been beautifully restored. It featured a new box with side rails and new front fenders with a spare-tire holder. It also had a custom-made wooden toolbox. The engine and transmission had both been rebuilt. A gear-reduction starter had been installed, and it had a rebuilt carburetor and distributor and a new greaseless water pump. It also had new brake rods and working turn signals and horn. It was a gorgeous restoration and came with a car cover. It ran and drove well. It came with a clean title. This one came at a bid of $13,000.

There were some great toy versions with unique appearances. An All-American Heavy Hauler 11 was a lowboy toy. It had a shiny black cab pulling the yellow lowboy along behind. It came with a matching cab and sold for $1,650.

Above: Selling for $17,000 was this gorgeous 1929 Ford Model A Roadster. It had been completely restored.

Above: The punched tin star pattern enhanced this walnut pie safe and drove this bid to $650.

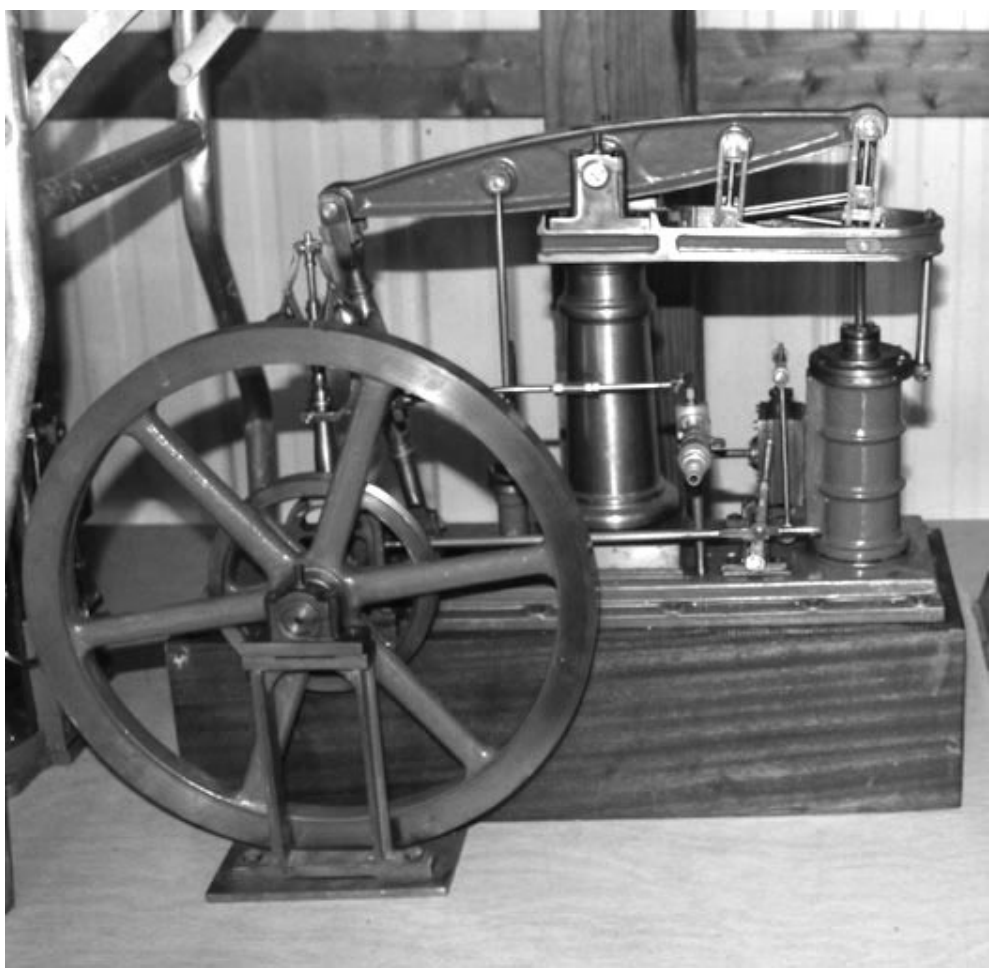

Above: Made out of walnut, this sugar chest brought a bid of $650.

Above: This is the original mold for the Doepke styling model that sold for $925. The blue Jaguar made from this mold on the right brought a bid of $350.

Below: Selling for $625 was this heavy-duty tabletop hit-or-miss engine.

A Popsicle Red Ball Express electric locomotive was put up for auction. This item was a premium prize. It had a seat for the rider and a small bell hanging on the front to be rung at the rider's discretion. Only 200 of these toys were made. It brought an impressive bid of $1,400.

A Doepke styling model with the original die was a very rare item offered in the toy ring. It sold for $925. It was the full die used to make the toy. The Doepke Jaguar kit made from this die sat right beside the die it came from. It was a beautiful blue color and came with the original box and shipping sleeve—the blue Jaguar toy sold for $350.

A restored heavy-duty tabletop hit-or-miss engine sold for $625. It worked as it should and made a great display piece when it wasn't being used. A large tabletop steam engine brought an impressive bid of $600.

Not everything that sold had wheels. A walnut sugar chest in great shape sold in the antiques and Victorian ring. It had two smaller drawers on the bottom and was in great shape. It sold for $650.

In incredible shape, a walnut pie safe had a punched tin star pattern. The original long, tapered legs added to the look, making this piece both usable and beautiful. It sold for $650.

An unusual piece of furniture was sold for $1,200. It was a fantastic, huge haberdashery cabinet. And not just any haberdashery cabinet. This one had hidden secret doors. With two glass doors in the center and six drawers across, it was indeed a very large piece of furniture.

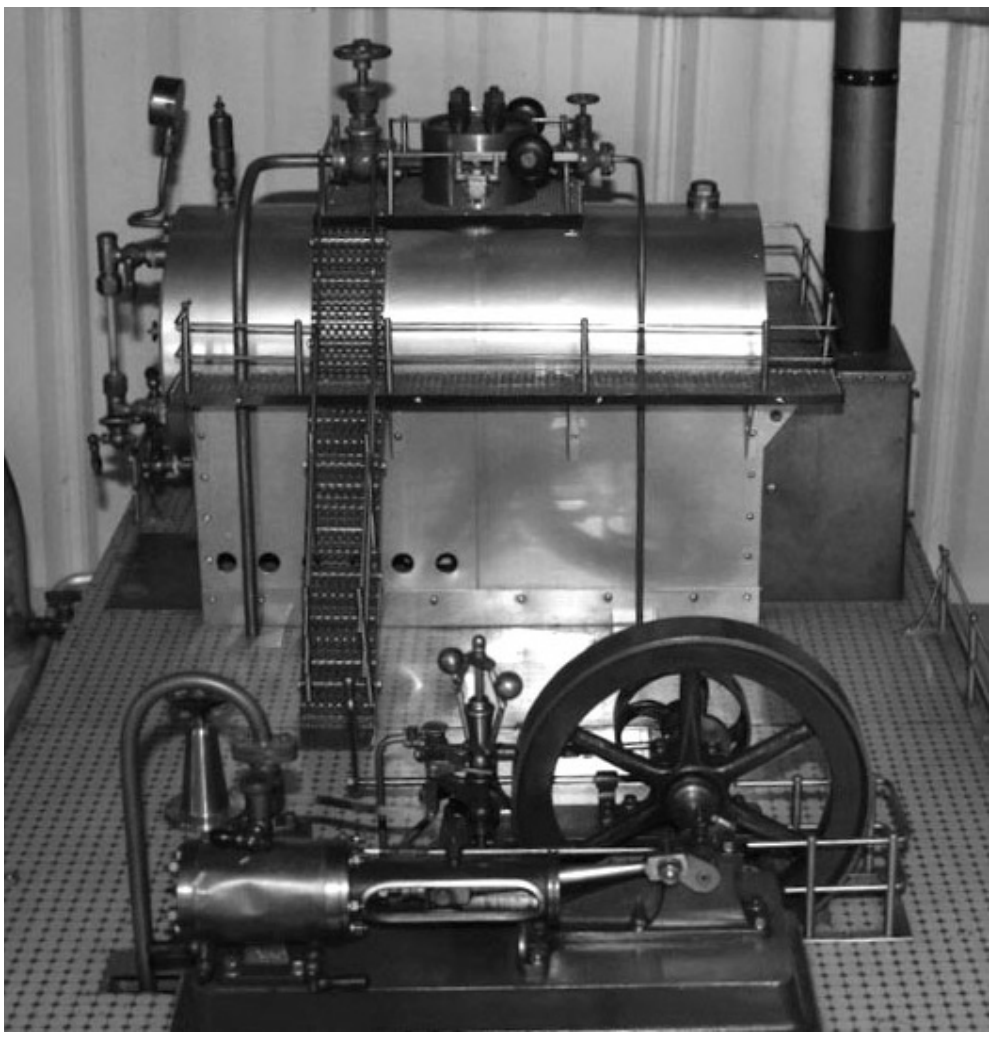

Several smaller engines were offered for sale. A tabletop steam engine was sold quickly for a bid of $600, while a heavy-duty tabletop hit-or-miss engine brought a bid of $625.

For more information on The Super Auction, visit TheSuperAuction.net.

Above: In the back is a red Popsicle Red Ball Express electric locomotive. It brought a bid price of $1,400. In front is a yellow lowboy Heavy Hauler 11 with a very shiny black cab, which sold for $1,650.

Below: This tabletop large steam engine came in right behind the hit-or-miss engine with a bid of $600.

Trade Tokens

an entity like a carnival might have employed them as a promotional device. For the issuing business, there were some distinct advantages over real currency: A token with a merchant's name kept the business's name circulating long after a transaction, and a customer holding a token had a reason to come back. Plus, if a token was never redeemed, the business didn't have to ante up the goods or services promised by the token.

Tokens often carried typical denominations such as 5-cents, 10-cents, or 25-cents. Others read something like "Good for 5¢ in Trade" or "Good for One Drink." These are sometimes called "good-fors," a term collectors still use today.

Trade tokens also had another important use: They filled in when regular coins were hard to come by. This happened during periods of coin shortages, most famously during the Civil War, when people hoarded government coins that were taken out of circulation due to rising demand for metal during the war. The result was a shortage of small change. Merchants and others responded by issuing privately made tokens that could circulate locally.

Most were made from inexpensive materials such as brass and bronze, although later examples can be found in cardboard, rubber, and wood. Many of the latter appeared as familiar "wooden nickels." Most were round, but octagonal and scalloped pieces were common. Unusual shapes could distinguish a token from official coins or other local tokens, and sometimes help thwart counterfeiting.

The information stamped onto a token usually has more appeal than the materials or shape. Tokens often identified the issuing business, town, denomination, or "Good For" value. Some included an address or image of the business. Many also bore the name or initials of the manufacturer - two of the more popular being Scovill Manufacturing Co. and Whitehead & Hoag.

For today's collector, those details are a big part of the enjoyment of the hobby. Trade tokens often carry details about where and when they were issued.

Above: Unlike a worn example, a sealed and Numismatic Guaranty Company (NGC) graded token for the Phillips Crab company was priced at $59.99.

Such details supply a good starting point for researching how and why the token was used. Yet, there are examples with little or no identifying information - referred to as mavericks - and for some collectors, figuring out what unidentified tokens were used for is one of the entertaining facets of the hobby.

Trade tokens were intended for a limited audience. A token issued by a factory in one town was unlikely to circulate far beyond it, and when the business closed, or the token was no longer used, there was little the holder could do with it. Many were discarded, while others were left behind in old buildings, stores and homes, where they would eventually be discovered by later generations. That's good news for collectors: trade tokens still turn up in old collections and estates, and because so many businesses issued their own pieces, new discoveries are always possible.

There are plenty of approaches to collecting trade tokens. Many collectors start with one interesting piece, and those originating from one's hometown can be particularly enjoyable. A token from a former local business can be a lot more appealing than a piece from an unknown entity halfway across the country.

Collectors typically settle into various niches. Some collect tokens from certain types of businesses, such as saloons or coal mines, while others look for those from particular eras or locations, like the Old West.

Rarity matters, but the story behind a token can be just as appealing. A common piece from a well-known factory, small-town business, or vanished industry can offer a fascinating glimpse into the past. Condition also isn't everything. A worn token with an unusual history may be more interesting than a pristine example with little else of appeal. For many collectors, the ideal find combines uniqueness, condition, and a good story.

Above: Among the most popular trade tokens are those from company stores, like this one from Gibraltar Coal in Kentucky ($11.55).

Fortunately, collecting trade tokens isn't generally an expensive hobby. That makes them an appealing choice for collectors who don't want to spend a lot of money on a hobby. Common examples can often be found in the $3 to $50 range. Graded examples will typically run $50 or more. Scarcer examples and those with particular historical merit can command prices in the hundreds and even low thousands of dollars.

What began as a practical way for businesses to handle trade, credit, and even shortages of official currency has become a way for collectors to explore the businesses and communities behind them. Tokens that once had value only at a particular store, factory, or mine now have an entirely different kind of value - as tangible links to the past.

Above: Trade tokens were used at a variety of locations. This unusual one ($24.99) was utilized at the Tennessee State Prison.

Left: This wood example, also of the "good for" variety, was available for $2.25.

Below: Many collectors begin with small lots of trade tokens, like this set of 12 for $36.99.

Below: An encapsulated 1905 penny inside a 10-cent trade token sold for $181.35 in 2026.
